WHO WE ARE:
The Department of Communication offers degrees oriented to research and theory about a central issue in life of the 21st century: dynamic and complex human and mediated communication. We are particularly strong in the study of new media and offer a BA, MA, and PhD, all designed to prepare students for a lifetime of learning based on the model of liberal education. Our approach is interdisciplinary and focuses on the impact of new technology on cultural practices, with emphasis on intercultural diversity, political communication, social media and social networks, mobile media, gaming and game studies, and information security and privacy.
